II. The Importance and Purpose of Financial Due Diligence

Financial due diligence refers to financial professionals, according to the acquiring party's objectives and commissioned scope, conducting investigation into the target firm's financial circumstances and various other related factors. Financial due diligence ordinarily employs methods such as document review, conducting discussions and interviews with senior management and key employees, comparing historical financial data and trend analysis, and finally the reporting of financial and tax risks along with the actual operational situation of the target firm in written form to the acquiring party.

Conducting financial due diligence prior to a proposed acquisition or merger, it can also be directed against ventures, mergers or other deals and transactions. Principal work is to centralize people related or interest related business activities and relevant financial data, the ultimate goal being to provide assistance to the acquiring party in eliminating asymmetric information, and allowing the acquiring party to obtain a greater depth of understanding with regards to the target firm. Due to the differing characteristics of various target firms, the scope of financial due diligence may differ from firm to firm. The acquiring party might also differ from an equitable level with that of the target firm. Therefore financial due diligence process should be modified or adjusted so as to meet the acquiring party's specific needs and expectations. Generally speaking, the most important usage of financial due diligence is to realize the following functions:

1.To sufficiently reveal financial and tax risks

2.To analyse a firm's past profitability and cash flow, and according to this forecast the firm's future operational prospects

3.To understand the target firm's assets and liabilities (including contingent liabilities), internal control, and the actual situation of operations management, providing a suitable foundation for follow-up negotiations, strategic investment decisions and the formulation of a post-acquisition business plan and integration program.

4.When compiled with other due diligence results such as legal and operational due diligence, to determine whether the item of investment in question is in keeping with the acquiring party's general strategic targets and investment principles.

Financial due diligence has the primary objective of establishing and understanding a target firm's actual financial situation in the recent few years (in most cases around three years), and subsequently forecasting its future financial situation. This is to serve for the acquiring party's valuation of the target firm. For strategic investment decisions as for example necessary information for forming a post-acquisition business plan and integration program, the target firm's internal control and actual situation of operational managements must be initially understood.

We help you identify key business drivers and KPIs, value adjustments, and other significant issues to ensure that you make an informed decision about the transaction. How we can support you by improving the buyer's understanding of the target business and thereby increasing the likelihood that the business will achieve its objectives. You should only be asked to sign once. Financial due diligence offers peace of mind to both corporate and financial buyers by analyzing and validating all the financial, business, operational, and strategic assumptions being made. An impartial financial and tax due diligence is necessary as it analyzes and validates all financial, commercial, operational, and strategic aspects of the business. Potential debt-like items highlight significant off-balance sheet liabilities, commitments and contingencies or other significant items, including any potential tax liabilities that may affect value and crystallize in the near future.
